Bird flu in US cattle has caused concern amongst milk-drinkers. Is cow's milk safe to drink?
Bird flu has been detected widely in pasteurised milk products in the US. We asked experts about the safety of drinking pasteurised and raw milk.
An outbreak of avian influenza in American dairy cattle has shown no signs of slowing in recent weeks, with nine states reporting cows infected with the H5N1 virus. The virus does not typically jump ____ cows to humans, but ____ April a farm worker ____ Texas tested positive for bird flu.
Remnants of the bird flu virus (H5N1) have been found in 20% of pasteurised milk samples in the US. Pasteurisation is a heating process used to kill pathogens such as the H5N1 virus, leaving non-infectious, inactive fragments of the virus behind.
The majority of milk in the US is pasteurised, going through an intensive heating process which kills pathogens, such as H5N1. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) strongly recommends against drinking raw milk.
